

Back-to-school plans work better before the first bell.

WEDNESDAY · AUGUST 5, 2026

A short planning conversation now can make the first weeks of school feel much more predictable across two homes.

Handoffs

Where and when will school-day exchanges happen?

School communication

Who receives messages, forms, and calendar updates?

Activities & expenses

How will new commitments and costs be discussed?

Schedule changes

How will updates be shared directly and in writing?

Back-to-school routines can expose small gaps in a co-parenting plan very quickly.

When children move between two homes, a missed school email, an unclear pickup plan, or a last-minute activity can create stress for everyone. A short planning conversation now can make the first weeks of school feel much more predictable.

Before the first bell, it may help to confirm:

Handoffs: Where and when will school-day exchanges happen?

School communication: Who receives teacher messages, forms, and calendar updates?

Activities and expenses: How will new commitments and costs be discussed?

Schedule changes: How will updates be shared directly and in writing?

The goal is not a perfect schedule. It is a clear, child-focused routine that keeps children out of the middle and gives both households the same information.

Every family and parenting plan is different. If the written plan no longer matches daily life, consider getting advice specific to your situation before making lasting changes.

Clarity can be progress, even before agreement.

A structured conversation can help separate what matters most from what has kept people stuck.

“Turning the page does not mean rewriting the past. Sometimes it means choosing a clearer way to decide what comes next.

FOUR WAYS TO PREPARE FOR A USEFUL MEDIATION CONVERSATION

01 Priorities before preferences

Know what is essential and where there may be room to move.

02 Bring the facts

Calendars and relevant documents can keep discussion grounded.

03 Look beyond positions

Needs can reveal options that fixed demands may hide.

04 Leave room to pause

Important decisions do not have to be made under pressure.

Mediation does not require two people to agree on every detail before they begin. It creates a structured place to identify what matters, understand where the differences are, and explore workable next steps.

A little preparation can make that conversation more useful:

Separate priorities from preferences. Know what is essential and where you may have room to move.

Bring the facts. Calendars, account information, and other relevant documents can keep the discussion grounded.

Think beyond positions. “I need stability” can open more options than “It has to happen my way.”

Give important decisions room. A thoughtful pause can be more productive than an answer made under pressure.

Turning the page does not mean rewriting the past. Sometimes it simply means choosing a clearer way to decide what comes next.

YOU WILL BE OK, WITH BOK.

Ordinary summer moments are still the good stuff.

There is no need to manufacture a perfect memory. Steady, simple time together is worth celebrating.

A few ordinary moments can make a week feel grounded.

A walk after dinner

A favorite meal together

A library stop

Ten phone-free minutes

August in Pittsburgh has its own rhythm: one more evening outside, one more trip for ice cream, and the first hints that school routines are almost back.

For families moving through change, simple traditions can feel especially grounding. They do not need to be elaborate:

- A walk after dinner
- A favorite meal at the kitchen table
- A library stop before the weekend
- Ten phone-free minutes to hear about everyone's day

There is no need to manufacture a perfect summer memory. A calm Friday, a familiar routine, and a little time together are worth celebrating.

However your family looks and wherever this season has taken you, we hope the weekend brings a few ordinary moments that feel good.

Happy Family Friday, Pittsburgh.
